★More ★Native A...Treatment of thyroid nodules with radiofrequency. A preliminary report. Radiofrequency was used to ablate nodules of the thyroid for treatment of adenomatous goiter and toxic multinodular goiter. The radiofrequency probe was inserted into the tumor through the skin of the neck and activated until inactivation. Analyses were made of the tumor of the thyroid by means of ultrasound, thyroidography, and scintigraphy. Forty-five patients were followed up after the treatment. We believe that the effective treatment of cancer by this technique does not impair the patient's condition. The treatment of benign goiters, in our opinion, should be considered with caution since the risks can be higher than those presented by surgery. The radiofrequency technique should be applied with caution to patients with thyroid cancer, since it can provoke local tumoral dissemination. The ocular migration of single-cell gonocytes in the Prussian white mouse. To confirm the ocular migration of single-cell gonocytes in the presence of the migration inhibitor n-butyl-cyanoacrylate. Single-cell suspensions of gonocytes were prepared from the testes of 3- and 7-day-old Prussian white mice and were treated with the migration inhibitor n-butyl-cyanoacrylate to induce immobilization of the cells. For visualization of gonocyte movements, fluorescently labeled cells were injected into the seminiferous tubules, and the number of cells that left the tubules was determined. Among the single gonocytes that migrate from the seminiferous tubules, approximately 50% remain in the tubules, whereas about one-third exit the tubules and enter the efferent ductules or the rete testis. The remainder of the single gonocytes in the seminiferous tubules are immobile and appear to be morphologically dead. The remaining gonocytes that exit the tubules enter the efferent ductules and the rete testis. In the presence of n-butyl-cyanoacrylate, the ocular migration of single gonocytes was significantly inhibited, resulting in their failure to leave the testicular lumen. Taken together, these results suggest that one-third of single gonocytes leave the testes via the efferent ductules and rete testis. The remaining two-thirds either die and leave the testes or remain as immobile gonocytes. These observations indicate that the death of gonocytes in vivo is not

A revolutionary would destroy, he would destroy the old before he has built the new. But a reactionary, he would not destroy before he has built the new. He would destroy before he has built the new. He would destroy the new before he has built it. That is what is called destruction. And so therefore the two are not complementary. It is either one or the other.
